Employers are in many ways in uncharted waters at present. Prior to the COVID-19 pandemic, requiring full-time in-office attendance was seen as an "essential function" of many jobs. There was often resistance to accommodations which departed from this norm and employers often took the position that accommodating a disability with remote work was "unreasonable." Most employers outside of school and healthcare settings also rarely had to think about policies related to employee vaccinations.

Now, in light of the heavy focus on remote work during the pandemic, more employees are likely to also request remote work as an accommodation for a disability or simply as a benefit or "perk," putting a spotlight on the varying approaches to office life. As many employers are either back in the office, in the process of returning to the office, or considering next steps, issues such as culture, generational differences, technological advancements, work-life balance, and what the workplace should look like come to the fore. There is no one-size-fits-all policy for remote work and whether COVID-19 vaccinations should be mandatory versus offering weekly testing options, especially when dealing with the Americans with Disabilities (ADA) and its state-and-local corollaries. The combination of employee accommodation requests for remote work and to remain unvaccinated for "personal" or non-ADA reasons can create further tension and opens up the potential for discrimination claims.

This ADTAtalk presentation will address shifting approaches to remote work, developing and implementing COVID-19 vaccination policies, and considerations relative to accommodation requests for these issues.
